

THE MUSKAN EDIT

twenty two looks
good on her

25 June 2004

as if the universe, for one quiet moment, decided to write poetry in human form.

And it called her Muskan.

She arrived softly,

like rain against a window at midnight,

like a song remembered after years,

like warmth finding its way through winter hands.

There is something about her that feels like pages from a novel

the kind you underline without realizing,

the kind you return to when the world feels heavy.

Some souls are loud in their beauty.

Hers is gentle. Lingering.

The kind that stays behind long after the moment has passed.

And perhaps that is what makes her unforgettable.

